EPA also asked that GAO acknowledge the agency's efforts that could help improve water quality data, such as the modernization of its primary computer system that stores and retrieves water quality data. GAO recognizes that EPA has many efforts aimed at improving water quality data overall, but notes that some of these efforts are limited in their ability to address the types of problems with water quality data identified. EPA also recommended that GAO add language to the report on the implications of inadequate data for identifying waters that do not meet standards. GAO agrees with this suggestion and has added a discussion of this issue to chapter 3. Second, EPA made several points about the content and presentation of the information in the National Water Quality Inventory. The agency states that GAO's report should more strongly note that the Inventory is, by law, a summary of state assessments of whether their waters are meeting standards and is not intended to be a national water quality report on a selected, consistent set of water quality parameters. GAO acknowledges this point and has stated so in this report. However, the broader question that the Subcommittee posed to GAO asked how well the report characterizes water quality conditions nationwide. As such, this report discusses the utility of the Inventory for characterizing water quality nationwide. Moreover, because the Inventory is used to help make national policy and regulatory decisions, GAO believes it is prudent for EPA to take steps to...
